"It's well known that Christian schools perform well academically. It seems faith-based education generally yields great results for students. Part of the reason religious schools do well academically is that their values are aligned with the values the students are taught in their homes.

The values taught in faith-based schools are not necessarily unique – values like respect, compassion and hard work are not confined to the religious sphere but this marrying of expectations between home and school, works well for students. The values of a faith-based school are the same values the parents want their children to aspire to." Metro Magazine (July/August 2019)
